This week was the first "normal" week for sailing conditions. Nice breeze at the start and getting lighter as the sun got lower. The winds were from the north, so the course was "across" the lake.

Usually the starting line has been set near to the permanent floating solar panel pump thing. Art had the idea of setting the start line further to the west. This put us in a different region with respect to the hills and trees on the shore that affect the winds on the water. It also meant that staying on starboard tack after the start had boats heading into the island. So same lake, same overall weather pattern, but different shifts during the racing.

One more week at Mountain View. Stevens Creek starting April 19th.
